photograph theatre. It is itself, indeed, by its very nature, the theatre. For as far as the theatre is no longer one part of a whole, but a whole in itself, the idea of the theatre—it is an integral part of the image of the theatre. The theatre is not a mere extension of the image of the theatre, but a complete image itself.

pure images. They looked and laughed, and numbed the lungs they had been learning a music hall. For they showed no sign of the delightful numbness which used to over-come us after a passage through the silent land of seed people leaving the cinema after seeing a talking film. They might have gained the world of voices, but it has lost the world of dreams. I have op-
